The end of calendar year 2014 also brings us closer to the start of the 2015 legislative session. Hearings will begin in November as soon as elections settle the members from contested districts. It's never too early to start thinking about proposed legislation, and if you have any ideas about statutory changes that might improve our ability to do our jobs please pass them on.

In that regard, as crime rates continue to decline there is an interesting dilemma that many of us may face. There are reasons why crime is down, and those reasons center on the resources that have been devoted to law enforcement over the last two decades. Not only have the state and our various counties and cities responded with funding that has allowed for increased manpower, but also statutes like 10-20-Life and PRR sentencing have enabled us to put serious offenders away for significant periods of time. Let's not lose sight of this and think that the problem of crime is somehow solved. This is not the time to reduce resources or loosen the tools we have. Doing so would be akin to thinking that because some medical treatment has controlled a problem it's OK to stop taking the medicine. Do that and the problem will inevitably return. Let's all keep...

IN MEMORIAM

Former SAO Chief Investigator Wiley Clark passed away on June 22nd as a result of injuries sustained in a traffic crash. Wiley served as an Investigator for the SAO for many, many years, often as a part of one of the various combined narcotics task forces that have existed now and then, until 1996, when he became Chief Investigator, a position he held until his retirement in 1998.

Former SAO Investigator John Tileston also passed away after a lengthy illness on July 16th. John T. worked for the SAO for many years after a long career with several other agencies dating to 1951, and then worked as a private investigator after his retirement from the SAO in 1991.

Both Wiley and John served the people of our circuit with pride and dignity and both will be missed by their friends and families, including in the law enforcement community.

Why Recording Interviews Can Actually Help You

Most everyone knows that there is a growing push to require law enforcement to record all interviews, either with a suspect in an interrogation setting or with witnesses. This was, for example, one of the many contentious discussions during the Innocence Commission meetings a few years ago. There are many reasons why proponents of this practice argue for it, and many logistic concerns why many agencies are concerned about the practicality of doing so. Here's a situation that points out very clearly one of the benefits of having done so.

Miranda Martin, along with her male cousin, concocted a plan to rob an elderly man in his home. The victim was severely beaten and died. Martin and her cousin botched the entire affair so badly that he was caught almost immediately and she was apprehended not much later.

Martin agreed to an interview with detectives. Actually, there were several interviews involving several evolving denials and half admissions over the course of many hours. During those interviews, which were both audio and visually recorded, Martin was alternately defensive, weepy, quiet, histrionic - you name it and she displayed the range of emotions you might expect. She was also, most importantly, at times impossible to understand.

Before trial, Martin claimed that she had said "I want to get a good lawyer." This, of course, would have been a clear invocation that would have required that the interview be stopped. The detectives testified that they never heard her make any such request.

Enter the recordings. On top of what the officers testified to about the lack of any invocation, at least that they heard, the trial judge actually listened to the recordings. The judge's ultimate order denying suppression found that the first time he listened to them he heard nothing like asking for a lawyer, and that only after listening two more times could he hear where the word "lawyer" seemed to be what was said." The judge also found that "I'm not sure that anyone not being told ahead of time, this is what you're listening for, would have any indication that that's what was being said."

It gets better. After Martin was convicted of murder and various other crimes, the appeal court also listened to the recording and agreed that Martin's statement was not clear. The appeal court also found that even the court reporter as she was transcribing the recording while it was being played during trial did not transcribe that the defendant said she wanted a lawyer. As a result, the conviction was affirmed.

The bottom line is that the recording made a credibility contest no issue and may have saved the day. Despite her claims, the recording itself failed to support what the defendant said had happened. As important as the content of her admissions, the recording proved their admissibility. In other words, while there are clearly circumstances that may make it difficult or impossible to record a statement the effort to do so is likely worth it. Not only does a recording prove what a detective says the defendant confessed to and eliminate defense arguments that things have been "mis-interpreted" or worse, but also the recording may eliminate any debate about voluntariness issues.

If this case sounds familiar, by the way, that's because it's a Gainesville Police Department case. Kudos to GPD and their several detectives who worked the case. Not only Martin but also her cousin have been convicted and are serving life.
It should come as no surprise that evolving case law on the technology available to law enforcement continues to impose requirements that were not previously in place. Specifically, it has now been held by the federal 11th Circuit Court of Appeals, under which Florida falls, that cell phone location information can only be obtained with a search warrant based on probable cause.

Quartavious Davis and some of his friends robbed six different stores in south Florida. Among other evidence, prosecutors placed Davis in proximity to five of the six stores through location information on his cell phone. That information was obtained without a warrant. Davis, of course, appealed, claiming among other errors that this violated his 4th Amendment right to be free from warrantless searches.

In discussing that complaint the court first reviewed 4th Amendment law and discussed the historical evolution of what was once a "trespass" theory to what has become both that and a "privacy" theory. The trespass theory focused on literal property rights and whether the property of the defendant had been breached. Privacy theory, on the other hand, focuses not on that but on whether the defendant could have reasonable expected privacy in whatever he was doing.

It has long been held that the warrantless interception of electronic data or sounds waves carrying communications without a warrant was prohibited by the 4th Amendment. With advancing technology, the newer question is whether that prohibition applies to not only content but also the transmission itself, which reveals location.

The United States Supreme Court has previously ruled that the gathering of GPS location data without a warrant violated the 4th Amendment. That case, however, was decided on the basis of the trespass theory because officers had attached a GPS device to the defendant's vehicle. In extending the same rational to cell phone location information, the 11th Circuit has applied the privacy theory, ruling that a subscriber may have no idea that his use of a cell phone can generate the kind of information about location that law enforcement now uses so routinely much less an intention that his provider will make that available. Perhaps most telling, the court noted that a defendant (or any other person) cannot control incoming calls at all and therefore could never consciously have decided or consented to passing information about his location that they would permit.

The bottom line is that to obtain cell phone location information a search warrant must be obtained, which of course requires probable cause.

In an opinion styled Riley v California and issued in late June, the United States Supreme Court ruled that law enforcement officers must obtain a search warrant before searching a cell phone taken from an arrestee. The Court held that cell phones differ both quantitatively and qualitatively in their immense storage capacity from anything else that an arrested suspect might be carrying, and that prior to the digital age people could not carry with them the cache of sensitive personal information that is now common place, rendering the search of a cell phone significantly different that a search of anything else an arrestee might have on him. The Court did allow for the possibility of exigent circumstances justifying a warrantless search of a cell phone in a particular case, but as a general rule that is no longer so.

If this sounds familiar it's because the Florida Supreme Court already came to the same conclusion and imposed the same warrant requirement in the 2013 case of Smallwood v State. All Florida law enforcement officers are should already be operating under the warrant requirement of Smallwood, so the Riley case has little practical impact on us.

HB 0227 Victims of Wrongful Incarceration – James Joseph Richardson Exemption
The Victims of Wrongful Incarceration Act was created in 2008 to compensate those determined to be actually innocent of a felony offense they were wrongfully convicted of and imprisoned for. This legislation creates a specific exemption that appears to only apply to James Joseph Richardson. Mr. Richardson was convicted of murder and sentenced to death in 1968 when 7 of his children died after eating food laced with the pesticide parathion. About 20 years later it was revealed that the former babysitter came forward and admitted to poisoning the children. The Governor issued an Executive Order appointing a special prosecutor to review the case. The special prosecutor nolle prossed the case after review. Mr. Richardson filed a petition for compensation under the act but was not able to prove ‘actual innocence’. So an exception was created to allow compensation under the act if:

Petitioner was convicted of murder and sentenced to death on or before December 31, 1979
Governor issued an Executive Order appointing a special prosecutor to review the case and Special Prosecutor entered a nolle prosequi of the charges.
